Unusual Jobs that Earn $100,000 or More

Hitting the $100,000 salary mark is the dream of a lot of people. And it's a dream that doesn't come true for many, not with average household income which is usually under $52,000 in the U.S. That's down from a peak of $56,800 in 2000, due to the inflation. But there are plenty of jobs where that salary level is the norm. A handful of those unusual jobs don't keep you in the office all day working with numbers. Fewer still are the jobs that are interesting and don't require advanced degrees. We turned to 2012 figures (the latest data available) from the Bureau of Labor Statistics in New York to identify unusual jobs that earn at least $100,000 a year. This isn't one of those easy professions you can get with just a bachelor degree. An astronomy job usually requires an advanced degree, but the payoff is handsome. The usual annual wage for astronomers was about $96,000 in 2012, but those who were lucky enough to work for the federal government, took home in general $139,000 a year. There is one downside to the job. Astronomers may need to work at night, since there is less radiation from the sun to mess with their observations then. But most astronomers work normal office hours and only visit observatories a few times a year. Another rare job is an air traffic controller. The stress from this job is one reason that the pay is so high. Air traffic controllers are also needed at night and on the weekends. The level of education needed isn't high; controllers need to complete a training course at the Federal Aviation Administration Academy. Because this job can be stressful, controllers often retire earlier than other workers. Those who have worked 20 years in this post are able to retire at 50, but they are required to retire at the age of fifty six.

Andalusia, a region of Spain, is a must-see for anyone planning to visit the country. This part of Spain, which lies in the southern part of the country, includes the cities of Seville, Granada and Malaga. It has a rich cultural heritage with influences from northern Africa. The beautiful architecture and the delicious cuisine are sure to delight you. However, there is one experience that visitors shouldn't miss: watching a flamenco performance. Flamenco is a musical form that started in Andalusia in the late 1700s. While its exact origins remain unclear, the musical style has a mixture of influences from Moorish, Andalusian and gypsy music. This form of music represents the diversity of cultures that give Andalusia its modern identity. Perhaps the thing that makes flamenco so enchanting lies in its simplicity. It only takes two or three people to make this beautiful music and there are three main sounds that characterize it: guitar, voice and clapping hands. Flamenco singers are famous for their deep and strong voices that are full of emotion. At times, the singer also dances with graceful arm movements and stomping feet. Today, there are over twenty different types of flamenco. Some include more than one guitarist and some have many dancers who whirl around onstage in long ruffled dresses and high heels. There is also a great variety of places to take in a performance, from large venues where you can have dinner and a show to tiny neighbourhood hangouts hidden in narrow alleys. Regardless of the type of flamenco you see or where you decide to watch it, you are sure to be charmed by this mysteriously powerful art form.
