School museums provide students with a great opportunity to expand their knowledge and help them study with more interest and, therefore, efficiency. That's why it's so disappointing that the museum at our school isn't used more effectively, even though it contains so much information.

Our school museum includes many different objects from many historical eras, a great collection of plants, some lovely paintings by ~~great~~^{serious} artists and even some ancient animal remains. The sections of the museum are located in such a way that you won't need any guidance to get around. There is so much interesting information in fact, that if only the museum was better advertised and more accessible, the engagement of students would increase rapidly.

The first problem is that most students' knowledge of the museum is limited. A lot of them think it's boring and, therefore, have no interest in visiting. The second problem comes with the limitation of public access to the museum. It's only open to students and the working hours are pretty short.

There are many ways to get rid of said problems. Firstly, the school needs to enhance the promotion of the museum. To do that we can hire volunteers to go around the school and advertise the museum. Secondly, we need to ^{introduce} ~~give~~ passes for the museum to members of the public and lengthen the working hours.

We think introducing these changes will have a positive output and increase the museum's popularity.
