Recently me and my classmates have found an issue we would like to talk about and give some recommendations about how to get things done. And the issue is our school's museum and the amount of students that go there.

The museum itself is great - it contains such a large amount of helpful information and interesting objects. The amount of knowledge you can get from there is priceless: so many historical facts, literature references and art exhibitions!

Sadly, the list of people that regularly use this source shortens rapidly, day by day. Each time the rooms are emptier than before. Everytime students choose Internet resources over real life ones. What we want for them is to be more open to new life opportunities, because it's important to give teenagers a chance to enhance their view on the world.

So the engagement we want to make is offering you the possible ways to solve this problem. The first one is "advertising" it on the school site so more people see it. The output is not going to get much bigger, but it's still better than nothing. And the second one is stating everywhere that there's no limitation to the amount of knowledge you get from here. It's important to educate yourself in order to become a better person.

That said we hope we can find a way to communicate and solve this get rid of this issue together, because it's all in our hands.
