In the modern world there are not many students, who like going to museums, so let's find out, why <sup>the</sup> museum resources are not used fully?

Our school museum takes place in large, light class and has very cosy atmosphere. The museum looks gorgeous and has a wide range things to see and to even do - this is why the amount of museum visitors is rapidly increasing now.

I suppose, that school museums aren't effectively used by the students, because museums usually don't look attractive <sup>and</sup> have very boring design, which <sup>make</sup> students feel sad and even lonely, so there's no <sup>students'</sup> engagement to go there. Pupils want to see bright museums, which have got a lot of fascinating things to see or perhaps even discover. In addition, I think, that students don't use museums properly, because they're not interested in it. I mean, they find it boring and not really essential in life.

In order to increase public access to the museum and involve students in using the museum resources for their education, museums have to have bright design. Also, I'd recommend people, who work in museums, <sup>be positive and try to</sup> make being in museum not funny <sup>(and always smile)</sup>.

So, I think, that students will go to school museums only if museums have positive and cosy atmosphere; if people, who work there, are kind, friendly and cheerful and if in this museum there are a lot of interesting subjects to see and touch. <sup>actually</sup> I think that it depends on money limitation - if school spends quite a lot of money on museum, objects in the museum are just amazing and attract plenty of students)
